The Text:

- (§1) As a parent and an observer of mankind, I grow increasingly concerned about the life that our children inherit, the values that they hold dear, and their expectations for the childhood seems to last but a few years until children become a market to be bombarded with advertisements on the television. They demand to have all that they see, and that they see, and regard it as their right to be entertained every waking moment.
- (§2) At school, most children are bored by the lessons, which they see as irrelevant to life as they perceive it. Life is about having fun now. Or, at the other extreme, school is fiercely competitive, and pupils are pushed by parents to achieve at all costs.
- (§3) The youth thought it could right all wrongs. Its ideals of peace and love are now much ridiculed as empty, Hippy phrases. If the world turned to the left in the 60s then it has lurched to the right in the past fifteen years. The recent years, are undoubtedly amore selfish, inward-looking era, with the individual out to look after himself, regardless of the effect this might be having on others. The new gods are money and materialism, and teenagers want now what it look their parents half a generation to achieve.
- (§4) If youth has learnt to question the wisdom of its elders, it has so far found nothing to replace it with. No wonder, there is drug abuse on a scale never seen before. No wonder so many children seek the help of psychiatrists. What are they to fill the emptiness of their souls with?

James Stuart, The Guardian
