

(1) It was early fall when Urban Exodus visited Mimi and Richard's Made in Ghent farm, farm store, bakery and gathering place. The apples were ripe for the picking and the fall harvest had started. The farm store was bustling with people coming to buy meat and bread for their evening meals. Mimi was busy in the kitchen, while Richard was working on various projects on the farm. Now, it is hard to believe that only four years ago this 75-acre farm was overgrown fields and a few derelict buildings.

(2) Mimi and Richard started as weekenders in Columbia County, they bought a little farmhouse on a small plot of land and would come up to escape the madness of New York City on the weekends with their two daughters. Each visit, they found it harder and harder to return to New York. Richard had worked in the advertising world for many years and the constant travel and stress had left him ready for the next adventure.

(3) With their two daughters entering high school they thought long about what truly held meaning in their life. They sold their home in the suburbs and moved into their little farmhouse. Richard commuted back and forth until they found their current farm, just a mile from their previous place in Ghent, New York. They invested their life savings to build Made in Ghent, knowing well that it meant their business had to become sustainable in order to not have to return to their previous city lives.

(4) Made in Ghent is constantly evolving and adding new offerings for their local and seasonal community. In addition to running an Animal Welfare Approved meat and egg business, Mimi makes bread. Both host farm dinners and run creative and business development workshops. Richard has channeled his former agency skills into his photography and has established himself as a respected photojournalist in the Hudson Valley.
